

CT9103W History of Christianity I: Origins to Us

Offered: 2018: Intensive – March (NAIITS Masters Unit)
[Unit offered alternatively as CH9103W]

This course examines Christian history with attention to the socio-spiritual location of Indigenous peoples in the Missio Dei. Many versions of the Christian story have reduced that story to a self-narrative, treating it as through it were a history of our civilization. This approach too often reflected the motives of colonial advance, and merged the transmission of the gospel with a Euro-centric view of the world. Contemporary historiography challenges this approach and highlights the polycentricity of Christian histories. This unit addresses Christian history from the perspective of Indigenous peoples, and affirms the importance of local histories for growth in and witness to the gospel.

Upon successful completion of this unit, it is expected that students will be able to:

1. organise a Christian history which attends to the polycentric and multiple nature of that history;
2. discuss theological developments through Christian history with reference to both a multi-denominational and international context.
3. drawing on the polycentricity of Christian history, discuss the possibility and importance of an indigenous Christian history;
4. develop historical and theological concepts for engagement in Indigenous ministry
5. critique and evaluate beliefs, actions, and traditions of Christian communities with a view to better facilitate Indigenous learning.
